Scientists led by Robert Edwards, MD, PhD, director of the Center for Regenerative Medicine at the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine, have successfully used the state-of-the-art CRISPR-Cas9 technology to correct a mutation that causes retinal disease in mice. In the study, published in the journal eLife, researchers engineered mice with a mutation that causes retinal disease, a type of inherited blindness, and replaced their photoreceptors with new, healthy ones created from human stem cells. The team engineered the new photoreceptors by downloading a sequence of DNA, using CRISPR-Cas9, into a human stem cell that could then be grown into a healthy new photoreceptor. "This is the first time that we have ever engineered retinal cells. It's the first time that we have generated a patient's own cells and turned them into a patient's own cells," says Edwards, who is also professor and chair of ophthalmology at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center. The research received funding from the National Institutes of Health. One of the most challenging diseases for doctors to treat is Stargardt's disease, an inherited form of blindness, which is caused by a defective gene in the eye called ABCA4. Mut
